VORASAN SUPAP

Waters of Life II

'Where, mighty rivers flow, there is life' – and no more so visually captured than in Asia, where beside the Ganges, the dead are buried ; along the Yangtse, crops flourish and perish, and on Thailand's own River of Kings, the Chao Phraya barges like giant walnuts laden with rice and dragon jars support water-side villages of whole families whose children are born, raised and schooled for a life time on the water.

Vorasan Supap is a voyeur of such lives. He has watched these anonymous vessels of life pass him every dusk and dawn from the home he shared with 4 other students while studying at Silapakorn university. "This will one day be no more" he feels, and perhaps he should know because the boy from an often-flooded village in Isarn in the north of Thailand came to Bangkok to be educated, to be modern and famous and all things associated with big cities. But the part of him that has tasted such life feels the sadness that never going back can bring. He uses his talent now to enable us to see his past which is slowly disappearing even from our reach, to preserve some part of it and skillfully incorporate it to the direction his future is taking.
